Natalia M. Dolgorukova

FIRST WORKS OF ARTHURIAN LITERATURE IN THE 12TH CENTURY: AT THE BOUNDARY BETWEEN HISTORY AND FICTION

BASIC RESEARCH PROGRAM WORKING PAPERS

SERIES: LITERARY STUDIES

WP BRP 07/LS/2015

This Working Paper is an output of a research project implemented at the National Research University Higher School of Economics (HSE). Any opinions or claims contained in this Working Paper do not necessarily reflect the views of HSE.
FIRST WORKS OF ARTHURIAN LITERATURE IN THE 12TH CENTURY: AT THE BOUNDARY BETWEEN HISTORY AND FICTION

The paper explores how the authors of the first works of the so-called Arthurian cycle tried to raise the status of their narrative using the Latin rhetorical triad (‘historia’, ‘argumentum’, ‘fabula’). Macrobius, Isidore of Seville, Geoffrey Map were just a few of the authors who used these categories for the analysis of literary works. This reflection on the form and function of the text is also important for the literature written in the vernacular (Wace, Chrétien de Troyes, Guillaume de Lorris, etc.). The paper shows that this intention was one of the reasons for criticism form the so-called “professional historians”, e.g. William of Newburgh, the British historian of the 12th century. First works of Arthurian literature (e.g. The History of the Kings of England by Geoffrey of Monmouth, Le Roman de Brut by Wace) contained specific historiographic claims and downplayed the proportion of invented elements. They could vary depending on the language (Latin and Old French) and the audience for which the texts were written.

Keywords: «Historia», «fabula», «argumentum», Galfrid of Monmouth, Wace, historiography, fiction

JEL codes: Z

1 National Research University Higher School of Economics. Departement of Humanities. Assistant Professor ; E-mail: ndolgorukova@hse.ru
2 The article was prepared within the framework of the Academic Fund Program at the National Research University Higher School of Economics (HSE) in 2015-2016 (grant № 15-01-0035) and supported within the framework of a subsidy granted to the HSE by the Government of the Russian Federation for the implementation of the Global Competitiveness Program.
1. Introduction.

Both Cicero (in his treatises De Oratore and De Inventione), Quintilian in his Institutio Oratorio and the anonymous author of the Rhetorica ad Herennium distinguished between three types of narrative depending on the degree of its verity, and they proposed «as do many minor writers on the topic as well, the categories of fabula, argumentum, and historia. A fabula is a tale not only invented, but containing impossible or highly improbable elements; talking animals, for instance, or humans metamorphosed into flora and fauna. Argumentum is also invented but neither impossible nor improbable; and historia is the relation of actual events. The literary genres deriving from these types of narratio are: tragedy or carmina from fabula, comedy from argumentum, and from historia history, the setting forth of the fact, of res gesta, the thing done» (Sargent-Baur 1996: 27).

This paper explores the way in which this Classical triad was the object of interpretation and commentary for a whole constellation of Middle Age Latin authors, whose ideas, in turn, resonated with writers created the first romance writings in their respective vernaculars in the 12th century. This paper begins form the review of Macroby’s and Isidore of Seville’s texts because the literature of the 12th century was influenced both explicitly and implicitly by the meta-literature texts of these medieval Latin authors.

2. Latin rhetorical triad («historia», «argumentum», and «fabula») and its reconsideration during the Middle Ages Isidore of Seville, who exerted a great influence on writers in the Middle Ages, devoted a lot of space in his Etymologiae to the contraposition and comparison of the three mentioned types of narration. In the first book of Etymologiae (Grammar, Chapter XLIV, The kinds of history /De generibus historiae/) he wrote, in particular: «Both history, ‘plausible narration’ (argumentum), and fable differ from one other. Histories are true deeds that have happened, plausible narrations are things that, even if they have not happened, nevertheless could happen, and fables are things that have not happened and cannot happen, because they are contrary to nature.» Isidore dedicated a separate chapter to the fable (XL, The fable /De Poets named ‘fables’ (fabula) from ‘speaking’ (fari), because they are not actual events that took place, but were only invented in words».

Developing his idea further, Isidore wrote about the functions of the fables: «Poets have made up some fables for the sake of entertainment, and expounded others as having to do with the nature of things, and still others as telling about human morals.» Fables created for entertainment were meant for simple folks (Isidore mentioned, as his example, comedies by Plautus and Terence, in which plots were invented; in this sense they were getting closer to his definition of «fable», that is of fiction). Fables created for the purpose of explaining the nature of things tell of animals and natural events, both real and not, such that never existed (as, for example, Hippocentaur, who was depicted as half-human and half-horse). Finally, fables on human behavior treat it «so that we arrive at the matter that is intended with the true meaning, though, to be sure, by means of a made-up narrative».

Thus Isidore followed the Classical rhetoric thinking, summarizing its basic ideas and repeating its triple division, while he mentioned both «historia», «argumentum» and «fabula» (invented narration). Let us remark here, however, that one fable type, written «in order to present human morals», invented narration containing some «true meaning» in part comes closer to the histories containing a narration on «true deeds that have happened» (res verae quae factae sunt). Let us also point out that the function of fables created for entertainment coincides with that, which Jehan Bodel, the 12th-century trouvère from Arras, regarded as inherent to «Breton sagas» (cf. his famous prologue to his Chanson de Saisnes): «Breton tales are empty and entertaining…», as opposed to Roman tales that «teach us understanding» and tales on France that are «always truthful».

Macrobius, a well-known Latin author of 5th century A.D. who was often quoted throughout the Middle Ages, made his contribution to the development of the Classical rhetorical thought in the introduction to his Commentary on the Dream of Scipio (Mehtonen 1996). This work by Macrobius was known to Isidore of Seville, whose Etymologiae «contain many references to Commentary», in particular his third book dedicated to astronomy. We shall try now to explore the difference between the literary thought of 3 «Item inter historiam et argumentam et fabulam interesse. Nam historiae sunt res verae quae factae sunt ; argumenta sunt quae etsi facta non sunt, fieri tamen possunt ; fabulae vero sunt quae nec factae sunt nec fieri possunt, quia contra naturam sunt » (URL: http://www.thelatinlibrary.com/isidore/1.shtml (12/12/2014)).

---

Macrobius and the conception of Isidore as well as the Classical rhetorical tradition.

Right at the beginning of his Commentar, Macrobius justified the use of fiction or, to be more specific, the use of dreams in philosophers’ works, in particular those by Plato. Macrobius defined fiction as follows (using the expected word—fabula): «Fables, which name alone announces openly that they are fictitious, were invented in one case only with the aim of simply providing entertainment to listeners while in the other case for the purpose of prompting them to lead a more moral life.» Macrobius indicated here, therefore, two functions of fable and fiction; the first one, delectare, coinciding with the function of fables which Isidore considered as intended «for entertainment»; the second one, docere, with the function of those fables that depicted human morals. Macrobius developed this statement further, simultaneously illustrating it with examples: any fiction aiming at only providing entertainment to readers (totum fabularum genus, quod solas aurium delicias profitetur)—as, for example, Menander’s comedies, practically all of Petronius’ works and some of Apuleius’ writings—was not worth the philosopher’s quill and was not to be included in philosophical writings.

Works that include fiction, which aims to prompt its readers to lead a more moral life, are divided, in turn, into two groups: «the narrative (argumentum) of some fables is completely invented and all of their storyline is woven out of sheer deception—as, for example, in Aesop’s fables that are known for their sophisticated inventions; in other fables, however, the narration (argumentum) is based on hard facts, which facts are presented only in conjunction with something invented and constructed; they talk in such cases about some «inauthentic narration» (narration fabulosa) and not fable (fabula)» (Macrobe 2003: LXVII).

Thus Macrobius mentioned the same word, argumentum, in his text, which a century later was to be used by Isidore, but it did not appear here as a separate narrative category. He introduced, however, a new type of narration—narratio fabulosa. His examples here are ritual Orphic and Hesiodic mysteries as well as mystical cults of the Pythagoreans that were dedicated to the origins of the gods and to their deeds.

The narration of this last type divided, in turn, into two subgroups. Even if some narration (argumentum) is based on real facts, it may contain something vile, abominable and obscene—for example, tales of gods’ infidelities or a story of Saturn who cut off his father’s phallus: philosophers prefer to omit narration of such type in their books. It also happens, on the contrary, that there is nothing indecent in the narration, that only worthy events and persons are mentioned; narration of this type, such «inauthentic narration», is acceptable in the philosophers’ works» (Macrobe 2003: 6).

Macrobius suggested a polynomial classification for fiction types which would be differing both by the degree of their distance from the «truth», from what really happened, and by their function and the degree of decorum. The boundaries between fiction and «truth» appear in his classification as less clearly defined, as more indistinct than in Isidore’s work. This classification was undoubtedly a guideline for the authors in the Middle Ages, when they used legendary or folklore material since it allowed them to find in it both partial «truth» and moral value.

During the 12th century, which mediaevalists call «the cultural Renaissance», the success of Commentary on the Dream of Scipio reached its apogee, the testimony of which is given by the number of rolls and manuscripts that contained this work. It is not a coincidence that Chrétien de Troyes mentioned the author of the Commentary in his first romance poems Erec et Enide (Erec and Enide), which was probably written during his stay at the court of Henry II of England (Plantagenet):

[Et] sor l’autre Erec seoir fist,
Qui fu vestuz d’un drap de moire.
Lisant trovomes en l’estoire
La descricion de la robe,
Si en trai a garant Macrobe
Qui ou descrire mist s’entente,
Que l’en ne die que je mente.
Macrobe m’enseigne a descrivre,
Si con je l’ai trové el livre
L’œuvre dou drap et le portrait⁴.

Chrétien de Troyes named Macrobius next to the word «history» so that his name served as a guarantee of the veracity of the narration; Chrétien says unequivocally in his text that it was the author of the Commentary who taught him the art of description (Macrobe m’enseigne a descrive).

Some decades later Guillaume de Lorris will also recall Macrobius in the prologue to his Romance of the Rose (Le Roman de la Rose) making him, just like Chrétien did, a guarantor of the truthfulness of his narration:

```
Maintes genz cuident qu’en songe
N’ait se fable non et mençonge.
Mais on puet tel songe songier
Qui ne sont mie mençongier,
Ainz sont après bien aparant.
Si em puis traire a garant
Un auctor qui ot non Macrobes,
Qui ne tint pas songes a lobes,
Ançois escrit l’avision
Qui avint au roi Scipion.
Quiconques cuit ne qui que die
Qu’il est folece et musardie
De croire que songes aveigne,
Qui ce voudra, por fol m’en teigne,
Car androit moi ai ge creance
Que songe sont senefiance…⁵
```

⁴ King Arthur sat upon the one, and upon the other he made Erec sit, who was robed in watered silk. As we read in the story, we find the description of the robe, and in order that no one may say that I lie, I quote as my authority Macrobius, who devoted himself to the description of it. Macrobius instructs me how to describe, according as I have found it in the book, the workmanship and the figures of the cloth (transl. by W.W. Comfort, Everyman's Library, London, 1914, P.74).

⁵ Many men say that there is nothing in dreams but fables and lies, but one may have dreams which are not deceitful, whose import becomes quite clear afterward. We may take as witness an author named Macrobius,
This all tells, undoubtedly, of the importance of the Latin literary theory to the first French romance writers for it legitimized their use of fiction which they did while trying to raise the status of their writings in the vernacular.

But let us go back to the 12th century and to our topic: the interrelationship of history and other types of narration. Walter Map (1140 – around 1210) who was a courtier of Henry II of England (Henry Plantagenet) blurred over the difference between «history» and fiction even more. In the first book of his main and only writing, De nugis curialium (Courtiers’ Trifles), Map named two narrative categories which we already encountered in Isidore’s work and in the Classical rhetoric, that is, history and fable, or historia and fabula: «we have histories which continue from the beginning of time and to our days, and we also read fables.» In Walter Map’s opinion, we value history because we find in it some mystical sense, intellectus misticus, through which we learn of and become familiar with the sense of proportion and humbleness. Walter named Biblical stories as his examples—those of Cain, of Sodom and Gomorrah, of Joseph and others. As for fables—such as the tale of the House of Atreus (Atreidai) and Thyestes, Pelops and Lycaon, as well as others, quite like these—they have the same, edifying, function as histories: «fables also serve us as edification». Therefore, as Walter Map assured, one should not avoid reading fables, since they have the same function as history: «both narration types obey the same laws and have the same goal» (Walter Map 1983: 126).

So, Walter Map does not insist anymore on the insurmountable difference between history and fable. Even if such a difference exists, since history is based on veritable truth (veritate nititur), while the fable is woven of fiction (ficta contextit), Walter was inclined not to set apart these two narrative categories, but to unify them, for their goal and function is the same—admonishing, counseling: «Both history based on the truth and fable that is woven of fiction bring happiness by their happy ending, because virtue triumphs condemning the unrighteous to their death—and both show how abominable is vice» (Walter Map 1983: 126).

who did not take dreams as trifles, for he wrote of the vision which came to King Scipio. Whoever thinks or says that to believe in a dream's coming true is folly and stupidity may, as he wishes, think me a fool; but, for my part, I am convinced that a dream signifies the good and evil that come to men, for most men at night dream many things in a hidden way which may afterward be seen openly (The Romance of the Rose 1971: 31).
The blurry boundary between «truth» and fiction, the partial or complete conjunction of their functions as well as the possibility of uniting them in the same work became significant to very different authors whom we mentioned in this chapter: for Walter Map and, as we shall ascertain below, for two «historiographers»—Geoffrey of Monmouth and Wace. The proportion of invented and «truthful» elements, however, as well as the mode of their combination was different for each author.

3. Geoffrey of Monmouth and his critics

In the beginnings of Arthurian literature, which was based on the «Breton material», there was Geoffrey of Monmouth (Galfridus Monemutensis), a Gallo-Norman cleric, who created in England, around 1138, during the rule of Henry I, the history of British kings, the «Historia Regum Britanniae». This chronicle, in the words of today’s historians, laid the foundation of the pseudo-historical tradition related to the Brittonic period of the island’s history» and «maintained its noticeable impact all until the early Modern Age» (Geoffrey started his History of the Kings of Britain from Brutus, an eponymous king, who came to Albion after the fall of Troy, and he ended it with the death of Cadwallader in 689 A.D. The History of the Kings of Britain reached us in over 200 manuscripts from the 12th-15th centuries, it gave English kings some celebrated Trojan ancestors and it also inserted the history of the Britton nation into the history of the Antiquity. Attempts at «extending» local history into the pre-Augustan time were generally made in England before Geoffrey, from the early 12th century, which had the effect of raising interest in the history of «Celtic» churches and Celtic saints. The History of the Kings of Britain by Geoffrey of Monmouth was accepted within the context of this development, for he tried to create a totally new version of the ecclesiastical history of the island, in the center of which a «Brittonic» church was placed. His conceptual approach in general—as opposed to its certain elements—was not accepted, however, by the English historiography of his time Geoffrey’s best known critic, William of Newburgh, his younger contemporary and English historian, dedicated at the close of the 12th century some very caustic lines to The History of the Kings of Britain and to its author—in the prologue for his Historia regum Anglicarum. William’s approach to the creation of the Northumbrian «model» of English history can be called «scientific» and «critical.» At the beginning of his work he speaks of Bede and St. Gildas, great historians, whose honesty and truthfulness was «fairly well proven», and he also laments that «a writer in our times has started up and invented the most ridiculous fictions concerning them, and with unblushing effrontery, extols them far above the Macedonians and Romans.» The next fragment which tells us what was William of Newburgh’s appreciation of history, also contains his comment that Geoffrey was nicknamed («surnamed») «Arthur», «from having given, in a Latin version, the fabulous exploits of Arthur, drawn from the traditional fictions of the Britons, with additions of his own, and endeavored to dignify them with the name of authentic history.» Thus William saw history as a truthful narration in Latin and he juxtaposed empty inventions (fabularum vanitatem) to true history, following in this in the paths of the Classical rhetorical tradition which we mentioned above: «Moreover, no one but a person ignorant of ancient history, when he meets with that book which he [Geoffrey] calls the History of the Britons, can for a moment doubt how impertinently and impudently he falsifies in every respect. For he only who has not learnt the truth of history indiscreetly believes the absurdity of fable.» Having asked the question why would Geoffrey make up and invent this, William offered two answers: «…either through an unchecked propensity to falsehood, or a desire to please the Britons, of whom vast numbers are said to be so stupid as to assert that Arthur is yet to come, and who cannot bear to hear of his death.» We shall have an opportunity to comment on these beliefs by the Britons; at this point we must note that after this remark William of Newburgh epitomized the content of Geoffrey’s book, demolishing and ridiculing all the deceitful stories told by this historian of the Britons. He dedicates his special attention to the history of King Arthur: «On the decease of Utherpendragon, he [Geoffrey] makes his son Arthur succeed to the kingdom of Britain – the fourth in succession from Vortigern, in like manner as our Bede places Ethelberht, the patron of Augustine, fourth from Hengist in the government of the Angles. Therefore, the reign of Arthur, and the arrival of Augustine in England, ought to coincide. But how much plain historical truth outweighs concerted fiction may, in this particular, be perceived even by a purblind man through his mind’s eye» (Wiliam Niyubourgsky 2010: 111).

Mentioning the description of a celebration at the king’s court, which we shall come back to later on, in a different context, William catches Geoffrey of Monmouth in one more historical mistake: «After this, with numberless triumphs, he [Geoffrey] brings him back to England, where he celebrates his conquests with a splendid banquet with his subject-kings and princes, in the presence of the three archbishops of the Britons, that is London, Carleon, and York -- whereas, the Britons at that time never had an archbishop.» William’s next argument is his appealing to the many historians who never, not one single time, mentioned King Arthur in their writings: «For how would the elder historians, who were ever anxious to omit nothing remarkable, and even recorded trivial circumstances, pass by unnoticed so incomparable a man, and such surpassing deeds? How could they, I repeat, by their silence, suppress Arthur, the British monarch (superior to Alexander the Great), and his deeds […]?»

Let us note that one more of Geoffrey’s readers, historian Giraud de Barri (around 1145-1223), his contemporary, explained why, for example, Gildas never mentioned King Arthur: «after Arthur killed Gildas’ brother, this saint got so furious that he threw into the sea all the wonderful books which spoke of our king’s great deeds». Giraud, however, mentioned in his text «our famous (famosus), not to say fictitious (fabulosus) Arthur», thus making this king into a hero of fables and fairy-tales and also, in the same breath, relegating to inventions or fables Geoffrey’s History and equating it to «historia fabulosa», that is to «apocryphal history», which is a new, hybrid, narration category which is so obviously related to Macrobius’ narratio fabulosa («inauthentic narration»); the latter contained a core of truth which was hidden under the fictitious narrative.

In the opinion of William of Newburgh, one more reason for Geoffrey’s descriptions of Arthur’s great exploits and deeds was his fear of the Britons: «it is to be noted that he [Geoffrey] subsequently relates that the same Arthur was mortally wounded in battle, and that, after having disposed of his kingdom he retired into the island of Avalon, according to the British fables, to be cured of his wounds; not daring, through fear of the Britons, to assert that he was dead – he whom these truly silly Britons declare is still to come» (Wiliam Niyubourgsky 2010: 111).

At the very beginning of Geoffrey’s book we can read as follows: «Walter, archdeacon of Oxford, a man of great eloquence, and learned in foreign histories, offered me a very ancient book in the British tongue, which, in a continued regular story and elegant style, related the actions of them all, from Brutus the first king of the Britons, down to Cadwallader the son of Cadwallo.» That is to say, a man learned in foreign histories (tales) offered Geoffrey some ancient book, which existence we may not be convinced of, but which, if we believe Geoffrey, told of a sequence of kings who ruled Britain. As told before, by referring to Gildas and Bede, neither of whom have seemingly never written anything about ancient kings of this land, Geoffrey decided to fill the gap and thus he dedicated a good portion of his History to the story of the birth and heroic deeds of the great king Arthur who vanquished the Saxons and was a threat to Romans, all of which came from this supposedly found book.

Geoffrey’s popularity and his subsequent reception were determined by the fact that «for a long time Anglo-Norman authors had information related to the distant past of their country only from what they could find in the works by some historians of the Antiquity and by Bede… The situation changed drastically with the publication of The History of the Kings of Britain written by Geoffrey of Monmouth. His work introduced a big number of completely new information regarding the early history of the «kingdom of the Brits» which could not be verified by other authoritative sources. » (Wiliam Niyubourgsky 2010: 112).

Thus Geoffrey was writing his own History using ancient tales that he heard from Walter of Oxford (which he will mention again when closing his last, twelfth book), and this History laid claim to being the truth beyond question: «[…] I advise them to be silent concerning the kings of the Britons [this refers to historians who were Geoffrey’s contemporaries: Caradoc of Lancarvan, William of Malmsbury, and Henry of Huntingdon], since they have not that book written in the British tongue, which Walter, archdeacon of Oxford, brought out of Brittany, and which being a true history, published in honor of those princes, I have thus taken care to translate» (Geoffrey of Monmouth 2007: 4).

In this way the author of the first text that gave rise to Arthurian literature introduced it as his translation of a truthful history written in the language of the Britons into Latin. His «historiographical claim» is strengthened by both stylistic peculiarities of the text (in which narration is preferred over weather notes and annals), and following the rules of Latin rhetoric, and a long prologue, or dedication, and the announcement (as part of the prologue) of his intention to write «the history of the kings of Britain», and, finally, the title of a book, which we can find out about in the last lines of Vita Merlini (Life of Merlin), one more work written by Geoffrey of Monmouth: «Therefore, ye Britons, give a wreath to Geoffrey of Monmouth. He is indeed yours for once he sang of your battles and those of your chiefs, and he wrote a book called «The Deeds of the Britons» which are celebrated throughout the world» (Wiliam Niyubourgsky 2010: 114).

Despite historiographical claims inherent both in the prologue and the introductory chapters of Geoffrey’s book, its text is defined by an intertwining of the severity and restraint in its historical sources with purely literary qualities. Nevertheless, some episodes of this work were obviously created in a rather dry and severe style, which, perhaps, was meant to attest to the veracity of all that the writer was describing. One of such episodes is his tale of how king Arthur was conceived. It has, obviously, a folklore basis: it resembled the conception of Alexander the Great by the last ruler of Egypt, pharaoh Nectanebo II (comparison of Arthur with Alexander, even if implicitly, is present throughout Geoffrey’s book) as well as the wondrous conception of Hercules, not a lesser hero indeed, which Zeus could achieve when he appeared as Amphytrion, Alkmena’s husband; tales of the same kind are also known in the Celtic folklore tradition.

This story, which is based on folklore, was, however, told in a very dry and laconic manner, with no vivid details. It is also telling that it was, in particular, very brief. In today’s edition of The History of the Kings of Britain (from the moment when Utherpendragon, Arthur’s future father, sees Igerna for the first time to the moment when she becomes his wife and two children are born to them, Arthur and Anna), this story takes up some eighty lines (Paragraphs 137-138). Geoffrey of Monmouth characterizes Igerna’s physical beauty with only one phrase, even if in the superlative: «Among the rest was present Gorlois, duke of Cornwall, with his wife Igerna, the greatest beauty in all Britain». The description of the burst of feeling that the king experienced is also quite laconic and matter-of-fact, it is still devoid of courtly wording: «No sooner had the king cast his eyes upon her among the rest of the ladies, than he fell passionately in love with her, and little regarding the rest, made her the subject of all his thoughts.» Merlin, who was king Utherpendragon’s counsel and helper, provides him, through the use of some magical herbs, with the likeness of Igerna’s husband, so that he could successfully spend the night with the woman he loved, during which Arthur was conceived. This tale in Geoffrey’s text does not have any dialog between his heroes, and his style is that of a chronicler providing a dry and impartial narrative of the actions that were taken in order for Arthur to arrive in this world: «The same night therefore she conceived of the most renowned Arthur, whose heroic and wonderful actions have justly rendered his name famous to posterity.»

Geoffrey used the same severe and laconic style in order to end the history of King Arthur: «And even the renowned king Arthur himself was mortally wounded; and being carried thence to the isle of Avalon to be cured of his wounds, he gave up the crown of Britain to his kinsman Constantine, the son of Cador, duke of Cornwall, in the five hundred and forty-second year of our Lord's incarnation.»

In the next section, we try to analyze the transformation of these episodes in the works of Geoffrey’s Middle Age translator—Wace.

4. Roman de Brut as Wace’s translation project. Function of omissions and additions. History of the Britons versus Roman de Brut.

Less than twenty years passed, and in 1155 the History of the Britons was freely translated. The author of the translation was Wace, who was the historiographer of Henry II of England. Lacking the intention for credibility, one of the first romance writings, just as History by Geoffrey of Monmouth, it was not without a claim to historical credibility and to the veracity of the narration. The Roman de Brut played a role of a «prototext» for this was «the first writing in the French language, in a certain degree dedicated to the Arthurian legend, that started to gain prominence and proliferate due to the History by Geoffrey of Monmouth (Dominique Boutet 1992: 9).» Wace, following Geoffrey’s History, insisted on the inseparable connection between the Classical world of Antiquity and the world of ancient Britons, between ancient Troy and new Troy, Troie Nove – future London. In this connection, Wace’s work—together with Geoffrey’s History of the Britons and two contemporary romances, the [anonymus] Le Roman d’Enéas (The Romance of Aeneas) and Le Roman de Troie (The Romance of Troy) by Benoît de Sainte-Maure, who was, just as Wace, creating his works at the court of Henry II of England (Plantagenet) and who succeeded Wace in his capacity as royal historiographer—became «inscribed into the new and modern perspective, according to which the French-speaking world of the 12th century had inherited the culture and the political authority of the Graeco-Roman world that moved from the east to the west» (La geste du roi Arthur 1993: 8) this is what Chrétien de Troyes would be writing about in the famous fragment from the prologue to his poem Cligès:

Ce nos ont nostre livre apris
Que Grece ot de chevalerie
Le premier los et de clergie, Puis vint chevalerie a Rome
Et de la clergie la somme, Qui or est en France venue.

Such a perspective of translatio imperii et studii was meant to confirm that the ancestors of the Angevine kings were Trojans.

Wace developed the episode regarding Arthur’s conception into a larger narration provided with new details. Let us mention at first that he dedicated 264 verses to this episode. He kept the superlative to characterize Igerne: «There was no lady so fair in all the land» («n’en ot plus bele en tut le regne» /verse 24/), but he also added two more verses which would subsequently become the most frequent description of women in the courtly literature of the 12th-14th centuries: «Right courteous was the dame, noble of peerage» (curteise esteit e bele e sage, e si esteit de grant parage /verses 25-26/). One more detail or, rather, motif, which we owe to Wace (for it was not present in the work of Geoffrey of Monmouth) and which would also start its wanderings through the literary works of the Middle Ages, was the depiction of love that the hero feels for a woman whom he had never seen before and whose beauty became known to him by word of mouth:

Li reis en ot oï parler,
e mult l’aveit oï löer;
ainz que nul semblant en feïst, veire asez ainz qu’il la veïst, l’ot il cuveitie e amee, kar merveilles esteit loee. (vv. 27-32)

This quote, as far as we are concerned, evidenced that the notion of love instilled by word of mouth, something that does not exist in Geoffrey’s text, would not give us the right to say that the feeling of love hit Arthur’s father «like a sunstroke» as A. D. Mikhailov wrote about it (Mikhailov 2006: 39).

Let us also note—before we can return to the comparison of Geoffrey’s and Wace’s treatment of the topic—that Marie de France would borrow from Wace when describing king Equitan’s sudden love to the wide of his seneschal, a feeling that burst into flame, even though he knew about her only from hearsay:

El reialme n’aveit sa per.
Li reisl’oï sovent loër.
Soventes feiz la salua ;
de ses aveirs li enveia.
Senz veüe la conveita… (vv. 41-45)

Anyone who read Le Roman de Brut was of the same opinion—that Wace was «rather a romance writer than a historian». The text of Le Roman de Brut was more rhetorical than the Latin original, and the octosyllabic verse that Wace used was in organic conjunction with his use of many rhetorical devices and of a certain picturesqueness; for example, Wace who wanted to achieve rhythmic effects would again and again use repetitions, citations and anaphors: «whether he ate or drank, spoke or was silent» («se il manjot, se il beveit, se il parlot, se il taiseit» /verses 35-36/) or this when Brut:

Vit les valees, vit les plainnes,  Sees plains and valleys,
[...],
Vit les eues, vit les rivages,  Sees lakes and rivers,
Vit les champs, vit les praeries, Sees fields, sees meadows,
Vit les porz, vit les pescheries, Sees harbors, sees water filled with fish,
Vit sun pople multepleier, Sees how his people multiply, Vit les terres bien guainier… Sees well-tended lands…
(vv. 1210-1216) (verses 1210-1216)

All these devices make Wace’s verses easier for both appreciation and performance (let us remind that these writings were meant to be spoken loudly and not to be read silently). We shall find analogous rhetorical passages everywhere in the text, like, for example, this one:

Ne puis aler, ne puis venir, I cannot walk, nor come about my business, ne puis lever, ne puis culchier, I cannot wake for sleep,…
ne puis beivre, ne puis mangier... Neither can I eat or drink …
(vv. 109-112) (verses 109-112)

Comparing other episodes in Geoffrey’s History and Wace’s romance provides similar results: Wace’s narration is in many cases more rich, it is more colorful, and it is possible to say that it moves even further away from the strict historical narration than its Latin original. Such a shift was in Wace’s case, of course, correlating with his using the poetical form of the romance in the vernacular and thus to a new audience.

For example, where Geoffrey was content with one phrase describing the fortress city Tintagel («he [Igerne’s husband] put her into the town of Tintagel, upon the seashore, which he looked upon as a place of great safety.»), Wace offered a whole wide picture to his readers:
Tintajiel ert bien defensable:
n’esteit par nul engin pernable;
de faleise est clos e de mer;
ki sul la porte puet guarder, mar i avra dute ne reguart que hum i entre d’autre part.

(vv.73-80)

«It was a strong keep, easily holden of a few sergeants, since none could climb or throw down the walls. The castle stood on a tall cliff, near by the sea. Men might not win to enter by the gate, and saving the gate, there was no door to enter in the tower.»

(verses 73-80)

Wace, unlike Geoffrey, included in his narrative dialogs between Utherpendragon and Ulfin (verses 105-128) as well as long monologs of the king (verses 202-225), his councilor Ulfin and also Merlin whom Wace made wear the semblance of Bertel and who was described in much more detail than in the Latin original (verses 149-174).

Let us also point out two important details which are not present in Geoffrey’s text and which first appear in Wace’s rendition. Firstly, Wace introduced for the first time the motif of the round table, which king Arthur established and of which Britons told so many fables:

Pur les nobles baruns qu’il ot, dunt chascuns mieldre estre quidot chascuns se teneit a meillur, ne nul n’en saveit le peiur – fist Artur la Rôunde Table dunt Bretun dïent mainte fable.

(verses 1019-1024)

Secondly, just like Geoffrey, Wace—when ending his tale of king Arthur’s rule and telling the year of his departure to the island of Avalon—conveyed several important details: he mentioned the Britons and their faith in the eventual return of the king, reminded of himself and of his own unwillingness to believe in the king’s disappearance because he seemingly did not know anything beyond what had been already told, and finally he added an emotionally tinted regret that Arthur was childless:

Arthur, si la geste ne ment, fud el cors nafrez mortelment ;
en Avalon se fist porter
pur ses plaies medicinier.
Encore i est, Bretun l’atendent sicum il dient e entendent ;
de la vendra, encore puet vivre.
Maistre Wace, ki fist cest livre, ne volt plus dire de sa fin qu’en dist li prophetes Merlin ; Merlin dist d’Arthur – si ot dreit – que sa mort dutuse serreit.
Li prophetes dist verité :
tut tens en ad l’um puis duté,
e dutera, ço crei, tut dis,
se il est morz u il est vis.
Porter se fist en Avalun pur veir puis l’Incarnatiun cinc cenz e quarante douz anz Damage fud qu’il n’ot enfanz :
al fiz Cador, a Costentin,
de Cornüaille, sun cusin,

«So the chronicle speaks sooth, Arthur himself was wounded in his body to the death. He caused him to be borne to Avalon for the searching of his hurts. He is yet in Avalon, awaited of the Britons; for as they say and deem he will return from whence he went and live again. Master Wace, the writer of this book, cannot add more to this matter of his end than was spoken by Merlin the prophet.
Merlin said of Arthur—if I read aright—that his end should be hidden in doubtfulness. The prophet spoke truly. Men have ever doubted, and—as I am persuaded—will always doubt whether he liveth or is dead. Arthur bade that he should be carried to Avalon in this hope in the year 642 of the Incarnation. The sorer sorrow that he was a childless man. To Constantine, Cador’s son, Earl of Cornwall, and his near kin, Arthur committed the realm, commanding him to hold it as king until he returned to his own.» (verses 4435-4458) livra sun regne si li dist qu’il fust reis tant qu’il revenist.
(vv. 4435-4458)

There were, however, omissions. We cannot agree with Ivor Arnold, the publisher of _Le Roman de Brut_, that these omissions are «rare and insignificant: some names of minor characters, Roman generals, Saxon leaders; names of Britons’ bishops from the times of king Arthur, and genealogy of the kings of Brittany (Wace 1938: LXXXVII).» One omission can be regarded as both serious and major: Wace excluded from his translation Merlin’s prophecy regarding the suture of Britain and its kings which Geoffrey introduced in the sixth book of his History. Possibly Wace was absolutely sincere when he confessed why he was not willing to pass on Merlin’s prophecy:

Dunc dist Merlin les prophecies
Que vus avez, ço crei, oïes,
Des reis ki a venir esteient,
Ki la terre tenir deveient.
Ne vuil sun livre translater
Quant jo nel sai interpreter…
(vv. 7535-7540)

Thus Merlin spoke his prophecies,
Which, I think, you may have heard,
About the kings who will come to rule
And will own lands.
I am not willing to translate his [Geoffrey’s—N.D.]
book,
Because I do not know how to interpret it.
(verses 7535-7540)

These prophecies were indeed very obscure, but we should not forget that Wace wrote for the less educated people and, as any writer of that period who used the vernacular, he aimed at making the content of his work simpler.

5. Conclusion

Diffusive nature of such categories as «truth» and «fiction», which was important for the literary theory of the 12th century, was significant for Geoffrey and his successors. The latter erased the boundary between them even further making his romance be closer to the «inauthentic narration» («narratio fabulosa»), truthful in its base, but containing many fictitious elements. Just as did other translators who created non-literal versions of Latin texts, Wace explained and simplified the original, while at the same time amplified it. Just as did other authors who rendered prose with verses, Wace introduced additional elements into his text, including epithets, descriptions, direct speech, and all of that is organically incorporated into the versified narration, because this type of narrative is conducive to it. In the meantime, it would not be possible to say that Wace restricted himself to the task that was usual for the authors of such translations: unlike them, Wace significantly increased the fairy-tale element in his version while introducing such additions there which were not sought after only in conjunction with the task of the translators in the Middle Ages.

References

Natalia M. Dolgorukova
National Research University Higher School of Economics. Departement of Humanities. Assistant Professor; E-mail: ndolgorukova@hse.ru

Any opinions or claims contained in this Working Paper do not necessarily reflect the views of HSE.

© Dolgorukova, 2015